

We Are to be Healers of Souls and Restorers of Hearts

We can be. That's because we are to operate in our sonship, touching others, just like Jesus of Nazareth did. We aren't able to do it until we give ourselves completely to him, genuinely forgive those who have hurt us, and allow his love to flood into us removing our own pain.

This is the teaching I received from Jack Frost back in the late 1990s.¹ I appropriated this in my life and I have been moving forward in this process of being healed myself ever since.

This process is for all sons. Unfortunately, we tend to focus on our hurts and are therefore ineffective in releasing others from their hurts because we're trapped ourselves. It can be achieved, but it requires our commitment. That's commitment by:

1. being completely abandoned to the King, and,
2. forgiving everyone (a heart attitude, not not just words), and,
3. being committed to releasing your own pain, and,
4. allowing his love to wash away all hurt and pain from you.

We were reminded of this process recently by the King through Brian Simmons:

“You will be a healer of souls and a restorer of hearts as I bring you higher in my ways. Give yourself to me, forgive all who wound you, and I will work on your behalf. Let your name be synonymous with mercy and grace. Wrap yourself in my likeness. Pour out forgiveness, the way I have done for you.

I know what pain is like. I understand what it's like to be rejected and misunderstood. But it's this pain that breaks you open, so that you can receive the healing balm of my love. As my glory pours into your wounded soul, it expands, saturating every cell and memory. Soon, anger melts away and is replaced with compassion. Even your greatest pain can be healed when you embrace mercy for others. You will witness my victory within when you release freedom to those who have hurt you. Don't hold on to the pain, staring at it like it is yours. I bore your pain and grief. Give me your pain, and I will heal your heart, so you can heal others.”²

We can't be used to touch others with the abundant, fruitful life of the Kingdom unless we are living it ourselves.
