- ★ “Key Points Climate Alarmists Get Wrong”

““The minute you hear 'the science is settled,' you know something is wrong. Science is never settled”, says Richard Lindzen, professor emeritus of atmospheric sciences at MIT. “Climate is one of the earliest examples of cancel culture ... I don't think the public is quite aware of the pressures that were brought to bear to get rid of opposition to this,” Mr. Lindzen says. In this episode, he breaks down key mistaken assumptions he sees fueling the climate extremism we see today, and explains why many climate policies, from the push to reduce cattle to bans on synthetic fertilizers, have been counterproductive and harmful. “And you see these policies have had no impact on CO<sub>2</sub>. So they have done nothing to prevent this alleged existential threat, except make people poorer, make society less stable, less resilient. And you can only account for that with either ignorance or sadism,” Mr. Lindzen says.”

- ★ “Climategate: Released Emails Show Blatant Censorship in Climate Journals”

“While the mainstream media around the world lead people to believe that a climate crisis will soon engulf the whole world (if it hasn't already), there are some people who've looked into the science and data—and they're not convinced. According to Anthony Watts, senior fellow for environment and climate at The Heartland Institute, when you examine the facts and data, it puts the media's scares into proper perspective and dispels much of the eco-anxiety that young people across the world experience. Specifically, during our discussion, he exposed how tribalism in science has led to mass climate censorship, how climate change has become a big business, how scientists are able to suppress science they don't like, the Climategate email scandal, as well as how temperature data gets skewed by climate stations.”
