

Exposing Our Misplaced Fanaticism

When I was a high school teacher I was fanatical about children attending school. I couldn't understand why parents would allow their children to do something else on a school day, such as being with their dad in the cabin of his work's semi-trailer all day. I'd get infuriated when parents took their children on holidays during school term time. I now realise that there's more to life and growing up than schooling. I also realise the essential role of parents in their children's growth and development, with family relationships being vitally important.

I've noticed also that police are fanatical about the law, even when the laws they enforce are in contradiction to federal Australian laws and/or the British Commonwealth laws which oversee our nation. They've recently been fanatical about enforcing woke laws and ideologies, over and above serious criminal activity. You can see this in the UK's Reclaim Party's video "Bad Law: The Rise Of The British Gestapo"¹ and with Melbourne police shooting rubber bullets² at protesters demonstrating about COVID lockdowns.

In religious matters, I was fanatical about Bible reading, attending church when I was in the mainstream church system. When I was in the pentecostal system, I was fanatical about witnessing wherever I went. In the Charismatic system, I was fanatical about tithing, attending church, the Bible as The Word of God and supporting the church leaders. Now I'm out of these systems, those fanatical activities and beliefs have vanished.

Once I understood the reality of life in the Kingdom as a son, these activities turned out to be totally irrelevant. The main defuser for me has been the understanding that what man creates and puts importance on, has no place in the Kingdom. What matters there is the reality of spiritual life that the Kingdom operates on and the priorities that the Trinity place on facets of life and activities. Nothing else demands our undivided attention and allegiance.
