When I started Nuclear for Australia, critics questioned whether the Australian public would ever engage seriously with the nuclear debate.

Today, we have the hard proof that your support is paying off. The conversation has changed: Australians across the political spectrum - Labor, Coalition, and Independents alike - are open to considering nuclear energy as part of our future.

Now it's time for our political leaders to catch up. These polling results create an opportunity we cannot afford to waste.

The next step is turning public opinion into political pressure. State and federal politicians need to hear directly from their constituents. They need to see the evidence, engage with the findings and understand that Australians want a serious discussion about our energy future.

That's where you come in.

Your support made this research possible. Now, we're working to put these findings in front of decision-makers, engage MPs across the country and make sure the public's views are heard in the halls of Parliament - at both state and federal levels.

Will you chip in $25, $50 or $100 today to help turn these polling results into meaningful political engagement?

Your contribution will help us take the evidence to politicians, build support for an open and informed debate, and push for the policy changes needed to allow nuclear energy to be properly considered in Australia's energy future.

Thank you again for making this research possible.

For too long, the nuclear debate has been held back by political bans and assumptions about what Australians will accept. Now, we have the evidence to challenge those assumptions.

You helped us uncover the Australians' views. Now, with your support, we can make sure politicians hear them - and have no excuse to keep ignoring the debate.

Thanks for everything,

Will Shackel
(Founder of Nuclear for Australia)
